

Street dance enlivens Labor Day weekend

By Mike Berger
Phi Kappa

⌘ Labor Day weekend is boring on the University of Illinois campus. Everybody has been here for a few weeks, and they all go home to get the little odds and ends that they forgot at home when they moved into their campus residences. The University is still trying to recuperate from New Student Week, and the good times do not roll—at least not until this year. Labor Day weekend did have one highlight in 1980, courtesy of Phi Kappa: a full blown-all campus street dance.

The Phi Kappa Crows have a good location on this campus to pull off such a street dance. We are right in the heart of the Greek community, and we also have two of the five campus dormitory complexes within five minutes walking distance. We couldn't think of a better place to put the band than on our own front porch, so we did.

Friday night about 10 Brothers took off to the Alpha Phi Chapter at Purdue to see their annual street dance and to partake in some partying. We all had a good time, and I'd like to thank our Brothers in the "near east" for making us feel at home.

Banner Made

When we returned to Champaign, I was quite surprised to see the front of our House. There was a huge banner spanning half the House with Alpha Chi Rho in large red letters on it. There was another sign announcing the street dance that night.

It would be hard to miss the news, and I don't think that anyone left in the area for the weekend didn't know about the dance. We had also

(Continued on p. 40)